Jacqueline's academic and professional journey was remarkable. She graduated summa cum laude from Temple Medical School, embarking on a career in psychiatry at a time when few women entered the field. Despite personal challenges, Jacqueline's resilience led to a reconnection with her family and a renewed dedication to her health after her heart diagnosis.

She was married to her late husband, Dr. Howard Gendell, and was previously married to Fred Harris, father of her beloved children, Beth Lauren Gibson, Alexandra Mary Harris, and Maximilian John Harris. In her final years, Jacqueline cherished reconnecting with her children and her six grandchildren: Noah, Nathan, and Julia Gibson; Ari and Adam Harris; and Jesse Harris.

A devout Catholic and lover of the arts, Jacqueline was passionate about literature, especially British cozy mysteries, and was an accomplished pianist with a deep appreciation for Jazz. Her support for local arts and the mission of the Little Sisters of the Poor was a reflection of her generous spirit. Her culinary skills, highlighted by her childhood cooking competition win with "Mother's Helper Chicken," remained a cherished family tradition.

Jacqueline's love for animals was evident in the joy she found taking care of her family pets. She was a generous soul, donating to her church and various charitable causes, embodying the spirit of her favorite, St. Jude, the saint of hopeless causes.
